

Something to think about if you live in a suburban area:

Do you have:

- 1) Adequate food for 6 months stored?
- 2) Adequate Water for 2 weeks stored?
- 3) A means of growing some of your own food in a long term situation?
- 4) First aid supplies on hand to treat minor-moderate injuries?
 - 4a) Supplies and training to do this long-term?
- 5) Medicine on hand for daily needs and minor contingencies?
 - 5a) Enough to last a long-term shortage?
- 6) A means of dealing with biological waste that does not depend on the functionality of municipal sanitary and water systems?
- 7) A means of sustained power generation?
- 8) A means of long-range communication that does not depend on the internet or cellular systems?
- 9) Adequate security to keep unwanted people out of your property?
- 10) The ability to DEFEND your property against potential attackers?
 - 10a) Supplies and training to do this long-term?

If you don't have these, what kind of pills are you taking to sleep at night?

These used to be considered "common sense" necessities that any family would prioritize over any kind of superfluous luxury commodity. How much debt do you have as a result of things you could CLEARLY live just fine without?

If any/all of our major economic systems, social services, communications networks, public utilities, or commercial supply chains were interrupted for a serious amount of time, would you be an asset or liability to those around you?

How many concurrent "disaster events" (and of what scale) do you think government organizations such as FEMA can realistically handle with any immediate effectiveness?

Just sayin', people...

99% of you are living like oblivious complacent sheep, ripe for the slaughter. You have the means to change that. START NOW!
